ADRIENNE WARREN

Her portrayal of Tina Turner in Tina, the Tina Turner Musical earned Warren an Olivier nomination in London before the show moved to Broadway, where her "River Deep, Mountain High" brings down the house every night. Now that she's back in New York, Warren—who previously earned a Tony nomination for her performance in Shuffle Along—has found time to indulge in a little extracurricular excitement. "Every so often," she says, "I love to go out and dance to something that's not Tina Turner!"

SUITE LIFE

The Gramercy Park Hotel, where these photos were shot, is best known for what goes on inside its walls. But guests checking in this month can enjoy outside delights as well—specifically, a visit to Gramercy Park, a private enclave normally open only to those with a key but also to hotel guests booking the Valentine's Day package, which also includes champagne upon arrival.

JEANNE GREENBERG ROHATYN

The power gallerist is gearing up for a busy year: In the fall she'll consolidate her three Salon 94 exhibit spaces into one newly renovated Upper East Side townhouse. The venue will open with an exhibition by Niki de Saint Phalle but promises to be more than just a workplace. "I tend to be a homebody," Rohatyn says, "so any party for me will most likely be in the gallery."

GENEVIEVE ANGELSON

It's no surprise that the New York-born actress (whose series Flack, a drama set in the cutthroat world of London public relations, is back for its second season this month) thinks the best kind of evening out is at the theater. "There's no night that isn't made better by seeing a play," she says. But orchestra seats aren't her only indulgence. "I also like buying myself something pretty," she admits.

ZSELA

When a New York nightclub was briefly evacuated just before this 24-year-old singer took the stage recently, she was concerned the audience would be shaken up when the show resumed. Luckily, her spare, haunting sound, which has made her a regular at art fairs and fashion shows—and is on full display on her debut EP—had a calming effect. “The energy was just right, maybe because we’d all been on a journey together,” she says. “Sometimes everything just works out.”

ALEXIS COE

"This is absolutely one of the most exciting years of my life," Coe says. She isn't exaggerating. This month her second book—a biography of George Washington called You Never Forget Your First—comes out, and later in the year production will begin on the big-screen adaptation of her first book, Alice + Freda Forever. "I've been working on these projects for years," she says. "I'm really ready to celebrate them."

A full-page photograph of actress Ashley Park. She is standing against a light pink wall, wearing a dark green, long-sleeved, sequined dress with a V-neckline. The dress is embellished with large, colorful floral appliques in shades of green and yellow, and a fringe of long, thin green tassels at the hem. She is also wearing a matching green necklace with a large pendant, large square earrings, a bracelet, and a ring. Her hair is long and dark, styled in loose waves. She is looking slightly to the right of the camera with a neutral expression. The lighting is dramatic, casting a shadow of her head and shoulders onto the wall behind her.

"Opening nights are funny, because they're big parties," says the actress, "but there are always things to worry about." She would know. This month the Tony nominee is starring in Grand Horizons on Broadway, come spring she'll lead a City Center production of Thoroughly Modern Millie, and this summer her first TV series, Emily in Paris, will premiere. With prestige projects like that lined up, what could there be to worry about? Park cracks a smile and says, "Working again the next day."

JEANINE TESORI

"I love celebrations with the family you've made," says the composer, who will have plenty of excuses for revelry this year—including the Broadway revival of her Tony-nominated Caroline, or Change in March and the December premiere of Steven Spielberg's film version of West Side Story, which she worked on as a vocal producer. "We've got to come together, get all dressed up, and toast what we've done."
